Contacting Social Work for Families with Children

If you are concerned about something in your family, you can contact social work for families with children by calling the service guidance of your own wellbeing services county.

You can also contact social work for families with children using a form available online. The form can be found on the websites of most wellbeing services counties.

Use the search term “contacting social services.”

After completing the form, social work for families with children will contact you.

Together with a social worker, you can look for services that help make everyday life easier for your family.

If the situation is urgent and you need help immediately:

During the day:

- Call child welfare emergency services.

In the evenings and at weekends:

- Call social and crisis emergency services.

Each wellbeing services county has its own emergency number. The emergency number can be found on the internet.

If the situation threatens life or health, call 112.

Child Welfare Notification

A child welfare notification can be made when:

- There is serious concern about the child's wellbeing.
- The child is not receiving sufficient care or attention.
- The guardian has serious challenges, such as substance abuse or mental health problems.
- The child behaves in a worrying manner, for example harms themselves or commits crimes.
- The child does not attend school even though they should.
- The child has experienced violence, mistreatment or sexual abuse.

A child welfare notification can be made without the guardian's permission.

Making a child welfare notification:

A child welfare notification can be submitted online. The form can be found using the search term "child welfare notification."

Advice on all child welfare matters can be requested from child welfare emergency services.

Urgent situation:

Call social and crisis emergency services or child welfare emergency services.

Each wellbeing services county has its own emergency number.

If the situation threatens life or health, call 112.
