What happens after a child welfare notification has been filed?

The notification is received. Social services receive the notification and record it.

A social worker quickly assesses whether the child is in danger.

If there is no immediate danger:

- A social worker or social advisor will contact the family.
- The parents will be told of the notification. They will be listened to.
- The social worker may arrange a meeting with the family.

If the child is in danger, help will be provided immediately.

The social worker may also meet with the child at a day-care centre, for example.

If it appears that the family does not need any support:

→ the child welfare notification will be closed.

If it seems that the family could benefit from any social service:

→ a service needs assessment will be initiated.
